The difference between the prevalence found here and in previous studies may be attributable to differences in the study populations used and the criteria for categorization of NPD as used in these studies. In comparison to those with NPD, adults with BMID reported a higher prevalence of obesity and were more likely to meet the criteria for obesity, suggesting an adverse metabolic risk profile as compared with adults with NPD. Notably, the comorbidities and anthropometric measurements associated with BMID were more prevalent than in those with NPD. These results are similar to those reported by other authors who found higher rates of hypertension, dyslipidemia, diabetes, and cardiovascular diseases among those with BMID compared with those with NPD \[[@B18]\]. In a study conducted in Japan, Ohara et al. found a high prevalence of metabolic disorders, particularly cardiovascular disease, in adults with BMID \[[@B25]\]. A large body of research has documented a high prevalence of a constellation of both psychopathology and obesity in youth and adults with BED. Given that BED is a type of obesity and a subtype of BED is considered one of the most common forms of obesity and that the underlying psychopathology associated with BED has been well documented, the relationship between BED and metabolic abnormalities is likely to occur in a manner similar to those with BMID or NPD. It is also possible that the relationship between BED and BMID, as well as NPD, can be causative as they share some common pathophysiologic mechanisms. Regardless of which risk factors considered, we observed that adults with BMID were more likely to meet the criteria for at least one of the four metabolic syndrome components than those with NPD. This supports the notion that BMID represents a greater risk of metabolic disease than NPD \[[@B26]\]. These findings are in line with those from studies conducted in the past decade that used the DASS-21 among individuals with BED \[[@B27]\], overweight and obesity \[[@B28]
